Letter from the Chairman

TO OUR VALUED VITAL FOR COLORADO COALITION MEMBERS:

Twelve months ago, only a small handful of Coloradans had signed our “Seven Principles” pro-energy pledge. Vital for Colorado was created just a few months prior with a simple mission: To promote the benefits of energy production in Colorado, highlight its importance to our state’s economy and support a rational, well-regulated and competitive regulatory environment that allows for energy production to thrive responsibly.

The response has been overwhelming. By the end of 2014, more than 34,000 Coloradans, businesses and civic organizations have signed our pro-energy pledge, including major chambers of commerce, trade organizations and well-known civic leaders.

That’s more than 34,000 people who have said they understand the importance of the industry; that they believe fracking to be safe; that they oppose wholesale energy bans; and that they believe Colorado should continue to regulate oil and gas in a comprehensive, statewide manner.

What does it all mean? It means that Vital for Colorado is one of the largest issue-based coalitions in the history of our great state.

As you’ll see in this Annual Report, Vital for Colorado had a very busy 2014.

We worked hard in the spring and summer months to provide the critical “voice of business” when politicians and others were debating whether to put two anti-oil and gas initiatives on the ballot. We attended county fairs, big trade shows, civic organizations’ meetings and open houses across the state as we talked with Coloradans about the industry and our pro-energy pledge.

This fall, we’ve been actively following the governor’s task force on oil and gas regulations, and many of our board members have voiced support for the industry at those meetings.

Colorado’s oil and gas industry continues to be very important to our state’s economic health, contributing nearly $29 billion to our economy each year and supporting more than 100,000 good-paying jobs.

But there continues to be much uncertainty as to how it will be regulated in the future.

And that’s where you come in.

Vital for Colorado’s coalition will be called upon over the next two years to not only support responsible and reasonable energy development, but to actively speak out in favor of common sense regulations that protect our environment but still allow the industry to continue to develop our natural resources.

As an organization we will continue to reach out to Coloradans who want to join our coalition and support this vitally important industry in 2015.

Look for our newsletters each month and look for us at events across the state. You can also keep in touch with us by visiting our website at vitalforcolorado.com.

Thanks for being an important part of our coalition. We look forward to working together with you in 2015 to support responsible oil and gas development.

Mission and Pledge

OUR MISSION

To promote the benefits of energy production in Colorado, highlight energy resource extraction as a critical part of Colorado's state economy, and support a rational, well-regulated, and competitive regulatory environment which allows energy production in the state to thrive responsibly.

We Support Responsible Oil and Natural Gas Development and We Oppose Energy Bands and Patchwork Regulations.

We agree with the seven principles regarding oil and natural gas development and hydraulic fracturing, or fracking. These principles are paramount to a vibrant and successful oil and natural gas industry in Colorado.

- 1 The oil and gas industry is a key driver of Colorado's economy. In 2012, the industry supported over 110,000 Colorado jobs, more than $29 billion in economic activity and almost $1.6 billion in public revenue.
- 2 Colorado is a recognized national leader in energy regulation. We have the most comprehensive and stringent environmental rules in the nation, including rules that require disclosure and ensure the safety and transparency of fracking.
- 3 Fracking has been safely used in Colorado for more than 60 years and more than 90 percent of all wells today are fracked. Fracking is a transformational technology, opening up more than 100-years' supply of domestic natural gas.
- 4 Policymakers and the public should rely on science, facts and data to guide discussion, not scare tactics and hyperbole.
- 5 Development of natural gas is indispensable to the continued expansion of wind, solar and other renewable forms of energy in the state. Because the wind doesn't always blow and the sun doesn't always shine, natural gas is an integral backup energy source – a cornerstone of Colorado's "all of the above" energy policy.
- 6 Colorado should continue to regulate oil and gas development in a comprehensive, statewide manner, rather than a patchwork quilt of inconsistent regulations. A comprehensive and consistent approach to oil and gas development is the best and only way to ensure that Colorado protects our natural environment while remaining an inviting place for current and future energy investment.
- 7 We oppose attempts to politicize energy regulation, enact wholesale energy bans or create regulatory chaos by repealing Colorado's traditional statewide approach to energy regulation.

Vital board member Jack Hays speaks at a press conference during Governor John Hickenlooper's Oil and Gas Task Force Meeting in Rifle on December 10. Vital for Colorado board members penned many op-eds and letters in 2014, and our organization was mentioned in the media throughout the year.

But now, thanks to advances in hydraulic fracturing and horizontal drilling, consumers are beginning to reap the benefits of our domestic drilling through lower energy costs and cheaper gasoline for their cars.

Why? Because hard-working Americans in oil and gas fields from Colorado to North Dakota down to Texas and beyond have brought competition to the global oil and gas marketplace.

Vital for Colorado played a leading role in organizing a coalition to oppose an environmentalist-initiated measure to ban fracking in Loveland. With the help of Vital for Colorado and countless other organizations, including the Loveland Energy Action Project, the measure was defeated this past summer.

"After Loveland, the tide had suddenly turned on the anti-fracking movement. Rep. Jared Polis, who was funding statewide ballot initiatives that would have given government control over private property and cost billions in litigation and compensation claims, faced immense pressure to withdraw his measures.

The pro-energy coalition Vital for Colorado made a direct plea on behalf of the broader business community that Polis stand down. At the final hour, Polis capitulated and pulled his initiatives."

“IT DOESN'T MAKE SENSE TO THROW OUR CURRENT REGULATORY FRAMEWORK INTO CHAOS, WHEN THE CURRENT REGULATORY SYSTEM IS WORKING”

An Open Letter to Colorado's Elected Leaders:

As current and former locally elected officials in the Republican and Democratic parties, we want to thank those leaders in the state of Colorado who are using their influence to seek a sensible balance between energy development and conservation—one that ensures rigorous regulation and enforcement, but in a way that is applied consistently and efficiently so that Colorado remains an attractive place to do business.

As those who follow this debate closely are aware, the State of Colorado does not take lightly its responsibility to manage, regulate, and oversee oil and gas development. In fact, our state has the most comprehensive and stringent regulations in the nation. Our fair state has seen significant energy development activity in the last few years, and our regulations have ensured that the development has not occurred at the expense of our environment.

As we approach another election season, there may be attempts at the ballot box to change the way Colorado currently regulates the oil and gas industry. Rumors abound as to whether an initiative will attempt to ban development processes, like fracking, or turn our state into a confusing patchwork of inconsistency by transferring regulation of the industry to hundreds of local governments. Neither outcome is acceptable or responsible.

Cities and counties across Colorado do not have adequate budgets in place, nor have we developed the in-house expertise to take over state regulation of oil and gas activities within our jurisdictions. Attempts to end Colorado's statewide approach to energy regulation would invite more politics into our energy policy, at a time when there is too much already, inevitably triggering regulatory chaos that chases energy investment to the many states that have embraced a balanced approach to energy development.

It doesn't make sense to throw our current regulatory framework into chaos, when the system in place is working well. We applaud leaders who are opposing these measures and stand behind you in maintaining our existing regulatory system for energy development.

DON'T BE FOOLED—SPECIAL INTERESTS WANT “ENERGY CHAOS”, NOT LOCAL CONTROL.

When drilling opponents masked their opposition to energy development as “local control,” Vital for Colorado told the rest of the story.

“FRACKING IS MAKING COLORADO BETTER”

An Open Letter to Governor John Hickenlooper’s Task Force on Oil and Gas:

Welcome to Loveland. We’re pleased you decided to meet here as you travel the state to learn more about energy development. We think you’ll find that in Loveland, we get it. We understand that it’s possible to protect our environment and community health, while still developing our natural resources in a safe and effective manner.

As you know, Colorado’s oil and gas industry is an important economic driver for our state, contributing nearly $30 billion to the economy each year and supporting more than 100,000 good-paying jobs. In Loveland, we have seen a boom in high quality jobs that work in support of the energy industry, thanks to the development happening in neighboring Weld County. The average salary for these jobs is more than $75,000 — much higher than the average wage.

We’re also proud of the fact that in Colorado, we have some of the nation’s most stringent environmental regulations in place to ensure the health and safety of our communities. In a beautiful community such as Loveland, protecting our quality of life is critically important. We also understand that a vibrant economy enhances our quality of life.

That’s why last June, when given the choice to ban hydraulic fracturing as a few other Front Range communities had done, Loveland said no.

Instead our city served as a model for other communities of what can happen when voters receive good information that allows them to make informed decisions and helps clear the fog of deception and fear wrought by activists.

Our message to you is simple: Colorado has tough, comprehensive rules governing oil and gas development; fracking is making Colorado better, growing our economy and making our country less dependent on Middle Eastern energy; and our overall approach to oil and gas development is working. Protect it.

Let Loveland be your guide. We get it.

for Supporting Responsible Oil and Gas Policy!

Oil and gas provides vital benefits to Colorado

from the Denver Post 03/04/2014

Common sense is too often in short supply when it comes to the state legislative process. As two long-time Democratic senators representing working families, we've worked hard to keep the common sense flowing when it comes to important Colorado issues and hold back on the partisan lather.

Few issues in our state need a common-sense approach more than energy policy. Unfortunately, some in the public discourse have lost sight of the vital role that oil and gas plays in a balanced energy policy, and the unequivocal fact that Colorado has passed — and continues to develop — the toughest, most comprehensive, and environmentally protective energy regulations in the country.

Meanwhile, others too quickly gloss over the fact that even in this new energy economy, we need clean-burning natural gas as back-up for those times when the wind doesn't blow and the sun doesn't shine. Still others seem prone to ignore the reality that more than 100,000 hard-working Coloradans rely on the oil and gas sector to put food on the table, put kids through school, and save for retirement.

If we refuse to see the vital benefits of responsible oil and gas development, we won't. If we can continue to produce natural gas safely, and if natural gas is the cleanest, most effective form of back-up power for wind and solar, why on earth wouldn't we embrace a sensible approach to natural gas development in this state? The truth is, we should and we are.

We've worked to keep the focus on the facts surrounding energy regulation, whether on the topic of hydraulic fracturing (which has been conducted safely in Colorado since the 1960s), environmental protection, community concerns, or proximity to residential areas. Unfortunately, some are now distorting the facts in order to push aside the common-sense, statewide framework of oil and gas regulation and replace it with a crazy quilt of regulations that vary widely from one community to the next. A group of respected business leaders recently called this demand for a patchwork approach to regulation "an invitation to regulatory chaos." We agree.

We come down squarely on the side of maintaining the "Colorado Way" of regulating oil and gas, putting the state in the principal position of oversight and control while requiring regulators, citizens, and energy companies to work actively with local government in addressing specific local concerns.

This "constructive partnership" structure has over the last several years produced significant benefits to every Coloradan. Our state is looked at as a model for how to achieve balanced, sensible energy regulation. Maintaining our current constructive partnership results in concrete, enforceable environmental protections for us all. Moreover, a comprehensive package of statewide regulations allows oil and gas companies to make business decisions with an established certainty. This keeps Colorado competitive as energy companies decide where around the world to invest precious capital.

As this debate moves forward, we believe policymakers should keep their eyes on the prize: a balanced and common-sense energy policy. We join business leaders across Colorado who support a consistent, comprehensive, statewide approach to energy regulation as the best means to secure public safety, protection of our environment, and a predictable business climate.

We believe that will allow our great state to continue realizing the real public benefits that responsible oil and gas development holds.

ASSOCIATIONS

AS OF 12/10/14

Looking Forward To 2015

OUR GOAL

Establish Vital for Colorado as the preeminent voice for responsible energy development among key non-industry stakeholders.

BUILDING THE COALITION

The Vital for Colorado team will continue its drive to add both breadth and depth to our coalition. Special emphasis will be given to gaining the support of (a) organizations and associations that have not yet signed the pledge, and (b) high profile business, civic and political leaders and other luminaries from all corners of the state.

In 2014, Vital for Colorado organized, or helped support, more than 70 events and presentations in conjunction with Coloradans for Responsible Energy Development. Our goal for 2015 will be at least 75 events and presentations.

BINDING THE COALITION

We want to create a vibrant, exciting organization with a sense of cohesiveness and participation among our more than 34,000 coalition members; build vision of the importance of “belonging” to the coalition; and increase communication geared toward fostering a common message.

Overall, the goal is to expand and animate Vital’s membership through meetings, educational events, targeted activities, and more frequent and consistent communications to its membership which will build cohesion and raise Vital’s profile.

Vital aims to be a high functioning liaison for numerous business groups, trade associations and chambers of commerce by closely coordinating with partners on briefings, educational events, and other areas to mobilize collective members.

Vital will use tele-forums to increase outreach/communications strategy to our membership and any other key stakeholder groups.

BUILD A ROBUST DIGITAL COMMUNITY

In 2015, we hope to expand Vital’s online presence and bolster its outreach efforts by building a robust digital community of supporters. The digital effort will include enhancing Vital’s website with more content and creating social media pages.

In 2015, we want Vital for Colorado to grow its coalition of supporters and continue to voice support for responsible energy development across the state.
